Donald Drutt has had a long and varied career in public service, commercial arts and private industry. Throughout his professional career he has been a carver. He renders intricate scenes in wood that are born out of the African American experience. He has exhibited his work in group shows across the country. The Tubman Museum is pleased to present this one-person exhibition of wood carvings by an artist whose dedication to his art is matched by his desire to make a positive contribution to his community.
